

INTERNATIONAL & COMPARATIVE

You'll speak the universal language of law.

Given Tulane Law's location in Louisiana, the nation's only civil law state, the school has taught both common and civil law courses for more than 175 years. This mingling of legal systems in Tulane's curriculum also sparked the development of our advanced comparative and international law program, which prepares students to tackle complex legal issues at home and across the globe. Tulane offers certificate programs in International and Comparative Law and Civil Law. It's our goal to train lawyers who can speak and think effectively in the world's diverse legal languages. No law school in the U.S. provides a comparable education in international law.

The Eason-Weinmann Center for Comparative Law arranged seminars, symposia and lectures on international and comparative law topics that draw hundreds of participants worldwide. The faculty-led Tulane European and Civil Law Forum and student-edited Tulane Journal of International and Comparative Law also highlight key global issues for international readers. And the Tulane Maritime Law Journal addresses international legal challenges that intertwine with maritime law.

Tulane's summer abroad programs in international and comparative law are held in some of the world's most beautiful and interesting countries. While destinations vary, recent past programs include Negotiation and Mediation in Berlin, Immigration, Asylum and Human Rights Law in Cambridge, European Legal Studies in Paris, and maritime law in Greece; international art law in Italy; and asylum and human rights law in England. Tulane students may also apply for internships with firms and organizations and extend their stay abroad.

Tulane conducts exchange programs with approximately 25 international universities, further exposing students to different legal systems. The law school also arranges summer internship opportunities abroad for students participating in international programs.
